Mr. Harden was at this time an elderly man without family and living a very solitary life for one naturally so social and domestic, and in the absence of other occupation was in the habit of gathering all local news and gossip in circulation. After glancing at the stranger out of the tail of his eye, Mr. Harden began the following monologue: Would you be finding the sleighing good over your way? No response. Did you drive all the way from your place this morning? No response. Then followed a good deal of rubbing of one hand into the palm of the other, a flushing of the face with righteous indignation and a quick, angry turn of the head in the direction of the stranger; Well I was just merely wishing to exchange salutations with you, said Harden, and if you haven...
